

In the name of God

The youth of the population can be a key part of scientific and economic growth, political authority, growth and vitality in any country. According to several sociological and national security theories, population has not only been introduced as the most important factor of a country's power, but its effect on the country's power is much greater than their economic and military strength.

Population control and limiting generation growth in countries is one of the means of dominating and disempowering them and preventing or stopping their progress.

The aging of the population, a problem that many countries have faced or will face with the ruling policies, causes the demographic balance to be disturbed and the imbalance between the producer and consumer population in a country. A small population and its aging is considered a threat to the progress and economic growth of countries and weakens the social dynamics and vitality of societies. An increase in the aging population means imposing various costs on governments. According to the warning of the International Monetary Fund, the elderly population in the Asian region is increasing at a faster rate than in the past decades, and this issue will lead to great pressure on the economy of these countries.

A fertility rate above the replacement threshold is important for the continuation of the future generation in any country, and now total fertility rate in many countries of the world, this index is very below this level. Governments should be aware of the fertility rate and youth of their population and take measures to manage it.

From the beginning of human history until now, "family" has been the key word for creating and maintaining population. With its historical and natural support and in the eyes of authentic and rooted societies, the family consists of a woman (mother), a man (father) and children, and all kinds of sexual deviations are not included in its definition.

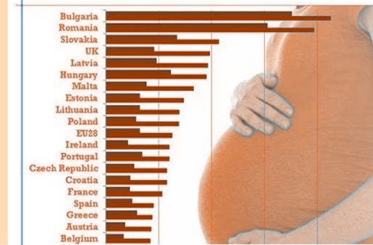

All kinds of efforts to change the sexual life of societies and destroy the family foundation are detrimental to the population of countries. This serious and often irreparable damage can be found by examining historical evidence in some developed countries.

In recent years, providing comprehensive sexual education to children and adolescents with the justification of HIV/AIDS prevention in the form of teaching and promoting "safe" sexual relations instead of teaching "accurate model of response to sexual-emotional instinct and restraint and abstinence skills" has provided and formed the basis for sexual promiscuity from childhood to adolescence. And the health of the family is at risk. Education in the context of the family – and not direct sex education – prevents any relationship outside the framework of marriage and protects the individual and the society from getting into trouble in the current deplorable situation of many western countries. However, some of these societies have recently turned to self-restraint education.

Human papilloma virus is considered to be the cause of sexually transmitted disease, which is most common among people with multiple sexual partners and relationships outside the family framework. The widespread promotion of vaccinations against this virus is a priority only in societies where the above-mentioned problems are common, and in family-oriented societies, it brings a worrying socio-cultural attachment.

This cultural and social attachment is the promotion of moral and sexual immorality by reducing its complications and consequences. Therefore, it is necessary for all countries to decide on the inclusion of this vaccine in the national vaccination program or similar programs according to their values and cultural, ideological, security and moral foresight, as well as cost-effectiveness studies.

Many countries are facing the phenomenon of the decreasing desire to have children. This problem has different roots in every society. One of the common roots is the increasing desire and tendency of women to study and work. Education and employment are considered women's rights, and a superior society makes maximum efforts to create a safe and dignified education and employment environment for women. But the problem arises when women are placed in the ambivalence or paradox of "education and employment" with "marriage and motherhood".

As long as the value of work and education for a woman is higher than the value of family formation and motherhood, it is marriage and motherhood that are left out or delayed. Governments should explain to their communities the value of forming and maintaining a family, having children, and raising children with proper culturalization and comprehensive measures, and empower girls and women to play a role in this field. Having children and raising a healthy and growing a human is the greatest service that humans can do for humans, and in different societies, nothing will replace it. A value that is no less than a conventional job and educational qualification. In fact, motherhood is a "job" that has no equal, and its profitability is hidden, and it is accompanied by long-term and fundamental effects. Motherhood is the most effective and sustainable social activism, and it is considered a form of long-term and profitable investment.

A child-friendly society needs government support and dialogue. Governments can make the society child-friendly by creating welfare facilities, providing infrastructure suitable for life, as well as and cultural discourse through media and environmental advertising. Governments should redesign society's infrastructure to accommodate families with multiple children.
